Technical Report

UEFA
CHAMPIONS
LEAGUE

INTRODUCTION

This technical report sets out to provide a permanent record of the 2011/12 UEFA Champions League – the competition's 20th season. In addition to recording factual and statistical information, it seeks to offer analysis, reflections and debating points which, it is hoped, will give technicians food for thought. By highlighting tendencies and trends at the peak of professional club football, it also sets out to provide coaches who are active in the development levels of the game with information that may be helpful in terms of working on the qualities which will be needed by the UEFA Champions League performers of the future.

A sell-out crowd settles into seats at the Fussball Arena in Munich as the Chelsea FC and FC Bayern München players line up for the competition's 20th final.

COMPETITION OVERVIEW

The road to Munich

During the 2010/11 season, the form book had been, by and large, respected during the group stage. This was not the case during the 2011/12 campaign, which featured 17 clubs who had not been on the starting grid in the previous season. In terms of the coaching profession, there was almost unprecedented stability, in that none of the eliminated teams changed their head coach during the group stage. Curiously, the most notable mid-season changes were registered at clubs which were still in action after the winter break, with FC Basel 1893 and FC Internazionale Milano making managerial substitutions, along with the eventual champions, Chelsea FC. However, the unusually low level of volatility in the technical area was accompanied by a high level on the pitch.

The most striking example was the elimination of the 2011 silver medallists, Manchester United FC, during a period when Sir Alex Ferguson was obliged to shuffle his lineup in order to cope with an extraordinary run of injuries. Much the same applied to Villarreal CF who, unusually for any Spanish competitor, finished the group stage without winning a point. The underlying factor was also a long injury list which often left Juan Carlos Garrido without seven or eight of his starters in contests against FC Bayern München, SSC Napoli and Manchester City FC in an exceptionally tough Group A. Most coaches are aware of the need to rotate their squads in order to cope with UEFA Champions League and domestic demands (the majority use 20 or more different players during the six-game group stage), but the vagaries of the injury list can often signify the difference between success and failure. Villarreal, in fact, were relegated at the end of the season.

In terms of on-the-pitch performances, differences between success and failure were frequently minimal. In Group A, Roberto Mancini's Manchester City FC lost out despite taking ten points, while five teams qualified with fewer. In a Group B which produced five draws, PFC CSKA Moskva reached the last 16 by beating FC Internazionale in Milan on the final matchday, to pip Turkish debutants Trabzonspor AŞ, who had also won at San Siro on the opening day but failed to win another game. In Group C, Basel, having raised eyebrows with a courageous 3-3 draw at Old Trafford earlier in the campaign, needed to beat Manchester United FC at home in their closing fixture – and did so on a night when very little went right for Sir Alex Ferguson's team. In Group D, where Real Madrid CF were unique among the 32 starters in winning all six group games, the drama was also reserved for the final matchday, when Olympique Lyonnais, having scored twice in their previous five fixtures, scored six in the second half against ten-man GNK Dinamo in Zagreb to edge ahead of AFC Ajax on goal difference.

In the other half of the draw, Chelsea needed to beat Valencia CF at home in their final match – and did so with a convincing 3-0 scoreline. The London club, during the run to the title (in which Andre Villas-Boas was replaced by Roberto Di Matteo after matchday 7) conceded only two goals in six games at Stamford Bridge. In Group F, Didier Deschamps' Olympique de Marseille reached the last 16 thanks to two goals in the last five minutes of their last match, which enabled them to come from 2-0 down to beat Borussia Dortmund 3-2 in Germany. In Group G, where 5 of the 12 games were drawn and a single point separated the top three, APOEL FC claimed first place despite scoring only six goals in as many games. By defeating Olympique Lyonnais in a penalty shoot-out in the next round, the side coached by Serbia's Ivan Jovanović made history by becoming the first Cypriot team to reach the quarter-finals. Group H was unique in that almost all issues were settled before the final matchday, with Pep Guardiola's FC Barcelona scoring 20 and conceding only 4 – all of them scored by second-placed AC Milan. By the end of the group stage, four of the five debutants (Manchester City FC, FC Oțelul Galați, Trabzonspor and FC Viktoria Plzeň) had been eliminated and only SSC Napoli had earned a place among the top 16.

SSC Napoli attacker Edinson Cavani looks anxious as Manchester City defender Joleon Lescott puts a muscular leg in his way during the 1-1 draw in Manchester on matchday 1.

Walter Mazzari's team came close to progressing even further when play resumed in February. A convincing 3-1 home win put them in the driving seat against Chelsea FC, only for the London side to fight back for a 4-1 extra-time victory in London. Olympique de Marseille, whose late goal in Milan eliminated 2010 champions Inter, combined with APOEL's shoot-out victory and two aggregate wins by a single goal, underlined the slimness of success v failure margins. The exceptions were José Mourinho's Real Madrid (4-1 home winners against CSKA after a 1-1 draw in icy Moscow) and Bayern and Barça, who scored seven apiece in their home games against Basel and Bayer 04 Leverkusen respectively. Such striking results prompted international critics to confirm the trio as favourites to compete for the title.

Events in the quarter-finals supported this theory, with Real Madrid emphatically ending APOEL's adventure and Bayern equalling them in recording home and away victories (against Olympique de Marseille), while Barcelona were made to work hard for a 3-1 aggregate win against AC Milan in a contest between clubs which had won the title 11 times between them. The semi-final quartet was completed by Chelsea, who, after a 1-0 win in Lisbon, played 50 minutes of the return leg with a one-man advantage after SL Benfica had had captain Maxi Pereira dismissed. Javi García's 85th-minute equaliser for the visitors left Roberto Di Matteo's side one goal from elimination – only for an added-time goal from Raul Meireles to post a deceptively comfortable-looking 3-1 aggregate victory.

The Londoners also teetered on a tightrope during a semi-final against the defending champions, in which Pep Guardiola's Barça had 72% of the ball – even at Stamford Bridge – and dominated 46 to 12 in terms of goal attempts. Chelsea, playing 53 minutes with ten at Camp Nou, relied on deep defending, last-ditch tackling or blocking... and the woodwork, with Lionel Messi striking a penalty against the crossbar in the return leg. Chelsea scored three goals during periods of added time at the end of each half to secure an against-the-odds 3-2 aggregate win.

The other semi-final was also a story of resilience prevailing. The pendulum initially swung in Real Madrid's favour in both legs – in Munich when Mesut Özil struck a precious away goal, only for Mario Gomez to snatch a 2-1 win for Bayern in the 90th minute, and in Madrid after the home side went 2-0 up in 14 minutes at the Santiago Bernabéu. But there were no further goals during the 93 minutes subsequent to Arjen Robben's 27th-minute penalty and, with 3-3 on the aggregate scoreboard, it was ultimately Bastian Schweinsteiger who clinched a 3-1 win for the visitors during a shoot-out in which four penalties failed to hit the net. As Chelsea prepared to travel to Munich to take on Bayern in their own lair, the critics who had predicted an all-Spanish final had been confounded by the narrowest of margins. It had been that sort of season.

THE FINAL

It was like a film script. The underdog, against all the odds, triumphing in the end, with a hero having the final say as he drifted off into a glorious sunset. The losers on this occasion were known as FC Hollywood (they acquired the name in the 1990s as a result of their celebrity status), and were viewed by the critics as Oscar winners-in-waiting. It was the Reds against the Blues; FC Bayern München versus Chelsea FC. Bayern had won four previous UEFA Champions League finals, while Chelsea were still searching for their first title at this level. The Bavarians were on home soil in Munich – it was their stage, their supporters (the majority), even their stadium announcer. But football has a habit of being unpredictable, and fate was on hand to deliver an ending that few would have foreseen as they made their way into the Fussball Arena München.

The game started as anticipated, with Bayern taking the initiative and Chelsea showing the kind of caution often displayed by investors operating in the depressed money markets of recent years. The starting shapes were similar (both 4-2-3-1), but the approach was diametrically opposite. UEFA technical team member Gérard Houllier (former boss of Liverpool FC and Olympique Lyonnais) has, from time to time, expressed the view that "some teams keep the ball – some keep the result." On a perfect football night in Munich, the home team wanted both, while the visitors were happy to take the spoils, unconcerned about points for artistic impression. In a first half which resembled a training exercise based on waves of attack, those in red dominated possession (60%), but apart from one driving run and shot by Arjen Robben, which Petr Čech deflected onto the post, their 13 efforts on goal failed to produce a breakthrough. Chelsea did have one impressive flowing counterattack, which concluded with Salomon Kalou forcing a save from Manuel Neuer at his near post. And Juan Mata did take a free-kick on the edge of the Bayern penalty box, but the end product was disappointing and on a par with much of the finishing by both teams during the first 45 minutes.

The weight of expectation on the German side was palpable and manifested itself in uncharacteristic anxiety when they entered the attacking third of the pitch. This, added to the resolute defending of the Londoners, ensured that the score sheet was blank when Portuguese referee Pedro Proença blew for half-time. Chelsea, without stalwart defenders John Terry and Branislav Ivanović through suspension, were comfortable playing their contain-and-counter style – the method that had seen them eliminate FC Barcelona in the semi-finals. Meanwhile, Bayern were showing signs of increasing frustration.

The second period started with smoke spreading from the red and white end of the stadium – it was fireworks on the pitch that were required, not in the stands. On the hour mark, Ashley Cole made a brilliant challenge to thwart Arjen Robben. It was another great example from Chelsea's repertoire of blocks, interceptions and tackles (and the occasional foul), much of which took place in their own half of the pitch. When the Blues did spring forward, Didier Drogba often found himself in isolation, left to his own devices.

Midway through the second half, Bayern earned another corner, their 13th of the game. Robben delivered, and, Chelsea's Ryan Bertrand, making his Champions League debut following the suspension of Ramires, headed the ball behind his own goal. Shortly afterwards, the exhausted youngster gave way to the experienced Florent Malouda. As Chelsea gradually increased their share of possession, Bayern continued to squander chances, although Thomas Müller did hit the target with a solid header, following a left-wing cross from Arjen Robben, but Petr Čech saved comfortably and the match remained goalless.

With 83 minutes gone, Bayern put one hand on the trophy. Thomas Müller's "rehearsal" a few moments earlier was about to prove invaluable. Again, a cross from the left, this time by Toni Kroos. David Luiz, Mario Gomez and Ashley Cole (blue, red and blue) all jumped to make contact with the ball, but they found themselves under its flight. Meanwhile, ghosting in at the back post was Müller – the Bayern No25 headed the ball down, and it bounced up into the roof of the net past a startled Petr Čech. Bayern were ahead and the contest looked like a fait accompli!

Fernando Torres replaced Salomon Kalou on the Chelsea right wing, while euphoria engulfed the red and white section of the crowd. David Luiz was yellow carded for a clumsy challenge on Arjen Robben, and Bayern felt confident enough to replace their goalscoring hero, Thomas Müller, with central defender Daniel van Buyten, who had been injured for months and who had played only in a reserve game eight days previously. Anatoliy Tymoshchuk went into his normal midfield role, alongside Bastian Schweinsteiger, in order to let the substitute take his position at right centre-back. Bayern were in control and ready to defend their lead. But the Chelsea players had proved during the campaign that they were resilient and while there was time, there was hope. As Fabio Capello said afterwards: "This Chelsea team never gave up."

Big games need big players in decisive moments, and Didier Drogba was certainly in that category. With two minutes of regulation time remaining, Chelsea's No11 exploded towards the front post area to meet an inswinging corner from Juan Mata. While Frank Lampard inadvertently blocked Drogba's marker, Jérôme Boateng, Chelsea's Ivorian striker powered a header past Manuel Neuer. The Bayern goalkeeper was rooted to the spot, unable to take the step forward which would have reduced the target. Suddenly the momentum changed: the phenomenon of losing the lead came into play, where those who have conceded become startled, even nervous. The force was with Chelsea.

THE FINAL

With the game tied at 1-1, extra time ensued, and within five minutes, Bayern had the chance to regain the advantage. Drogba, back in his own penalty box, fouled Franck Ribéry and the referee immediately pointed to the spot. Ex-Chelsea player Arjen Robben took the kick only to see Petr Čech read his body movement and make the save to his left-hand side. Scepticism about fate and destiny was beginning to evaporate, but if a penalty shoot-out was to decide the match, the Germans would win – wouldn't they? Bayern substitute Ivica Olić had the chance to score a late winner from a diagonal pass from his captain Philipp Lahm, but the Croatian side-footed the ball past the far post and it was time to face what many describe as the "lottery".

Bayern had history: three previous UEFA Champions League games won on penalties, including the final in 2001. Chelsea, on the other hand, had participated twice and lost both times, including in the 2008 final against Manchester United FC. As the two coaches, Jupp Heynckes and Roberto Di Matteo, made their shoot-out selections, Didier Drogba received intensive massage on his tired calf muscles. Bayern captain Lahm scored first, Mata missed (to be accurate Neuer saved to his left); then Gomez, Luiz, Neuer and Lampard all found the net. Ivica Olić's effort was saved, before Ashley Cole restored parity with a well-struck, left-footed shot into the corner. And then two remained: Bastian Schweinsteiger hesitated on the run-up and his shot struck the post (the Chelsea goalkeeper appeared to get the slightest of touches on the ball). Bayern's midfield dynamo hid his head inside his jersey. Finally, almost inevitably, Didier Drogba stepped into the spotlight. Chelsea's talisman proceeded to send Manuel Neuer, the Bayern keeper, the wrong way, and the big striker's right-footed shot swept into the unguarded corner of the net. Chelsea, against all the odds, were champions.

The blue and white end of the ground went crazy. The Chelsea players ran to their frenzied fans and threw themselves to the ground in joyous abandonment. Their opponents were already on the turf, prostrate and in despair – this was not the script they had imagined. After the trophy presentation by the UEFA president, Michel Platini, I made the man of the match award to Didier Drogba. As one coaching colleague remarked: "If Drogba had been on Bayern's side, they would have won – such was his impact on the game." While we waited in a packed press conference for the plaque handover to begin, I asked Didier what had been the key moment for him: his headed equaliser or the final penalty? "Definitely, the penalty," he said. Of course, the header had saved the day – the penalty had won it. That decisive act was to be Didier's last in a Chelsea shirt, and he drifted off, Hollywood-style, into the sunset, a "larger-than-life" star and a winner.

THE FINAL FOUR

Before the start of the 2011/12 UEFA Champions League semi-finals, three out of the four competing coaches had already won gold medals in the competition: Jupp Heynckes (with Real Madrid CF in 1998), Pep Guardiola (with FC Barcelona in 2009 and 2011) and José Mourinho (with FC Porto in 2004 and FC Internazionale Milano in 2010). By the end of the campaign, the fourth, former Italian international Roberto Di Matteo, had joined them in his capacity as interim manager of Chelsea FC. Taking over after the dismissal of André Villas-Boas, he guided the side for the remaining three months of the season, winning both the FA Cup (against Liverpool) and the Champions League by eliminating FC Barcelona in the semis and beating FC Bayern München in the final (4-3 on penalties). On the European stage, Di Matteo's Italian background was evident in the style his Chelsea adopted. Not exactly catenaccio, but drifting in that direction. Like Inter under Mourinho in 2010, his winning formula was based on solid defence, counterattacking and set plays. He also had big-match players, such as Didier Drogba, Frank Lampard and Petr Čech, who proved to be inspirational when it mattered.

Roberto Di Matteo, interim manager of Chelsea FC at the time, jubilantly lifts the cup in Munich.

Jupp Heynckes, the losing finalist with FC Bayern München, must have thought that he was in line for the title after his team eliminated Real Madrid CF in the semi-finals, and then when he faced a depleted Chelsea team in the final at home in Munich. His confidence must have soared when his side led 1-0 against Chelsea in the final with eight minutes to go, and again when his team went 3-1 ahead in the penalty shoot-out. But football's unpredictability, its capacity for last-minute twists of fate, left the Bayern coach the victim of a hard-luck story.

José Mourinho lost out on penalties to Bayern in the semi-finals, but the Real Madrid boss still remains the hot favourite to be the first coach to win the title three times with three different teams. And Pep Guardiola, the champion of progressive possession football, stepped down from his post at Barcelona at the end of the season, having won 14 titles in four years, including the Champions League, the UEFA Super Cup and the FIFA Club World Cup twice each. He gained the respect of his coaching colleagues for his incredible results, but it was the style which he created that gained him universal admiration. Although his side fell at the penultimate hurdle in the 2011/12 season, his contribution to UEFA's benchmark competition has been extraordinary.

Jupp Heynckes, silver medallist in 2012, had previously lifted the trophy when his Real Madrid CF team beat Juventus in the 1998 final at the Amsterdam Arena.

José Mourinho lifted the trophy for the second time after FC Internazionale Milano's victory in Madrid in 2010.

A KING WITHOUT A CROWN

For the fourth season in a row, Lionel Messi of FC Barcelona was the king of the UEFA Champions League goalscoring chart but, because of his club's elimination at the semi-final stage, there was no champion's crown this time for the world's best player. The Argentine goalscorer surpassed himself with 14 goals, two more than Mario Gomez of FC Bayern München, four more than Cristiano Ronaldo of Real Madrid CF, and an increase of two on his previous record total of 12. Barça's diminutive No10 had the distinction of scoring five goals in one match (against Bayer 04 Leverkusen) and, along with Kaká, Karim Benzema, Nicolás Gaitán and Franck Ribéry, was equal top of the assists table with five. His third goal against Bayer 04 Leverkusen (in the round of 16, second leg), a magnificent chip over the advancing goalkeeper using his "weaker" right foot, was voted the third-best open play goal of the season by UEFA's technical team. Team-mate Andrés Iniesta's brilliant inter-play and finish at Camp Nou against FC Viktoria Plzeň was first, and Ivan Perišić's late volley to tie Borussia Dortmund's home match with Arsenal FC was placed second.

Barcelona and Real Madrid were the top-scoring sides of the 2011/12 season with 35 goals each, a remarkable return considering that neither reached the final. Chelsea FC, the champions, and Bayern, the runners-up, scored 25 and 26 respectively. In a season with some high-scoring matches (Barcelona, Olympique Lyonnais, Bayern and Valencia CF all scored seven in a single match), the grand total of 345 goals was 10 short of the previous season, but 25 up on 2009/10. The semi-finalists (Barça, Real, Bayern and Chelsea) accounted for 35% of all goals scored, excluding penalties taken in shoot-outs.

Once again, based on personal interpretation, the following goalscoring chart details the technical and tactical action which led to the 345 goals.

Lionel Messi lobs Bayer 04 Leverkusen keeper Bernd Leno to score his (and his team's) third goal at the Camp Nou, going on to score a record five goals in Barça's 7-1 win.

OPEN PLAY

More than three-quarters of the goals scored during the season (78%) were the result of open play. Over recent years, the pattern of goalscoring in this section has remained fairly stable, particularly in relation to long-range shooting, dribbling and finishing, as well as diagonal balls into the penalty box. The difference in the figures registered for own goals and defensive errors was also negligible.

However, there was a slight decrease in the number of goals emanating from combinations and through/forward passes. But, the drop in this category could not be attributed to the top four sides: Barcelona, Real Madrid, Chelsea or Bayern. Apart from the quantity, each produced, from time-to-time, penetrating passing and collective play of an extraordinary level. Two great examples of this central penetration were Lionel Messi's through-the-eye-of-a-needle pass to Xavi Hernández for the winning goal away to AC Milan in the group stage, and Bayern's intricate combination play which culminated in Mario Gomez scoring his, and his team's, third goal in their home victory against SSC Napoli.

With a number of teams playing on a narrow front, notably the Italians, crossing and finishing was not quite the fertile source of goals it was a few seasons ago, although it did remain one of the top two ways of creating goalscoring opportunities, on a par with incisive passing. But there was an increase, for the third season running, in goals being scored as the result of cutbacks (i.e. getting to the byline and playing the ball back into the path of a supporting player). This was often the end product of effective flank play, the kind highlighted by Chelsea and Real Madrid. Mesut Özil's cutback to Karim Benzema for Madrid's opening goal in the 6-2 victory over GNK Dinamo Zagreb was a fine example of the art, while Chelsea's extra-time winner against SSC Napoli by Branislav Ivanović, from Didier Drogba's assist, illustrated the move to perfection. Interestingly, the delivery in both cases was not from a traditional winger, but an attacking midfielder and a striker respectively. The increased mobility of middle-to-front players and the high quality of overlapping full-backs maintained the importance of flank play in a season when wide players often operated out-to-in, as was seen with Arjen Robben and Franck Ribéry of FC Bayern, Xherdan Shaqiri of FC Basel 1893, Juan Mata and Daniel Sturridge of Chelsea, and Mesut Özil of Real Madrid.

Overall, there was a balance between goals set up from the wings and those originating from central-area attacks. In the latter category, solo play was a factor, with long-range shooting and running with the ball leading to 16% of open-play goals. Shooting from distance was championed by Real Madrid, Napoli, Bayern, Borussia Dortmund and FC Shakhtar Donetsk – Ivan Perišić's volley for Dortmund against Arsenal and David Silva's low drive for Manchester City FC at home to Bayern were two of the best. Meanwhile, Mathieu Valbuena's dribbling run and shot for Olympique de Marseille to beat Dortmund away, and Gonzalo Higuaín's individual effort at Santiago Bernabéu for Real Madrid in their 6-2 defeat of Dinamo Zagreb highlighted the value of those who can single-handedly make and take a chance, particularly in an age of sophisticated, compact defending.

For the second successive season, FC Barcelona provided two of the top three, though AC Milan's Kevin-Prince Boateng was the only player to feature twice in the top ten with a stunning strike against FC BATE Borisov and an equally impressive near-post finish against Barça. Andrés Iniesta claimed top spot with a double wall-pass and a flick over the last FC Viktoria Plzeň defender. Ivan Perišić earned second place with a magnificent volley after a set play had been partially cleared. And Lionel Messi's trademark run culminating in a right-footed chip over the keeper was voted into third place.

SET PLAYS

There was a modest drop in the number of set-play goals (76 in 2011/12), in comparison with the two previous seasons (82 in each). In percentage terms, therefore, the last three campaigns have seen a gradual decrease from 25% to 23% to 22%.

On the other hand, the number of penalty goals, not including those taken during a shoot-out, has risen year on year, from 14 to 24 to 28. This has coincided with the introduction of the additional referees at either end of the pitch, and their influence on refereeing decisions could be part of the reason for this trend. Goals from throw-ins also increased, but this was only from one up to the grand total of two – SL Benfica and Dortmund were the successful exponents of this particular move.

Although the rate of scoring remained stable, the return on investment from corner kicks was again unimpressive. For the second season in a row, it took, on average, 46 corners to produce one goal – i.e. 1,250 efforts to deliver 27 goals. Four times in 125 games, the winning goal came from a corner, four times it contributed to a draw, and nine times it provided a significant contribution to a successful result. Real Madrid even scored twice from corners when they beat Olympique Lyonnais 4-0 at the group stage. As usual, corners were a valuable weapon in some teams' armouries but, in an aspect of the game where delivery of the ball is everything, the figures provided some food for thought. The Munich final was a case in point: Bayern took 20 corners with nothing to show for them, while Chelsea were awarded one and Didier Drogba proceeded to score with a header from an inswinging cross by Juan Mata. A lot of effort goes into preparing corners, but often with little return.

Cristiano Ronaldo of Real Madrid and Hulk of FC Porto were the only players to score twice in the competition from direct free-kicks. The Madrid maestro's 75th-minute strike against APOEL FC in the quarter-final home match was voted the best set-play goal of the season. From wide on the left, the Portuguese international sent the ball, right footed, over everyone in the goalmouth area and into the far corner of the net. Real went on to win 5-2 and 8-2 on aggregate. Only four other players scored directly from a free-kick, the same as in 2010/11 and eight fewer than the 2009/10 total. In addition, goals from indirect free-kicks were fewer than in previous seasons, dropping from 25 to 21 to 11. These trends may only have been a blip, but with intense spying making the element of surprise almost redundant in these situations, the value of a dead-ball specialist was further emphasised.

Both in terms of quality and quantity, goalscoring in the UEFA Champions League, especially in open play, was once again impressive. As Pep Guardiola remarked: "In recent years, we have seen more daring teams and an even better spectacle in the Champions League." Few would argue with his assessment, particularly with the scoring exploits of Messi, Ronaldo, Drogba, Gomez, Boateng, Cardozo and others providing the icing on a very rich cake.

Cristiano Ronaldo's fearsome right-footed strike from the left during Real Madrid CF's quarter-final return leg against APOEL FC was rated the best dead-ball goal of the 2011/12 season. The equally deadly left-footed strike by FC Porto's Hulk earned him second place in the chart, while David Villa – who missed most of Barcelona's campaign with a serious injury – took third place. All were free-kicks, as were seven of the top ten. Didier Drogba's 88th-minute header in the Munich final was the highest-rated goal from a corner, the other two being Edinson Cavani's near-post effort for SSC Napoli and David Fuster's header which rounded off a short corner in Olympiacos FC's match against Arsenal FC.

GOALS SEASON BY SEASON

The 2010/11 season had registered the highest total of goals since the elimination of the second group stage from the fixture list, and although the 2011/12 figures reveal a slight decrease, the scoring rate remained high. The last two seasons occupy first and sixth positions in terms of the all-time goalscoring rankings. However, the 2011/12 campaign was one of peaks and troughs. The 96 matches played in the group stage accounted for only 244 of the goals at an average of 2.54 per game. The mean for the season was pulled up to 2.76 by knockout rounds which yielded 101 goals at 3.5 per fixture, helped by FC Barcelona's and FC Bayern München's seven-goal tallies in their home legs of the round of 16. A total of 38.5% of the season's goals were scored by visiting teams. During the group stage, the percentage was 44%, helped by the final matchday in Group D, when Olympique Lyonnais and Real Madrid scored ten away goals between them. During the knockout rounds, only 25% of the goals were scored away from home, compared with the 56:44 ratio in 2010/11 and 63:35 in 2009/10. During the first knockout round, 45 goals were scored by home teams and 11 by visitors. In the first legs of the quarter-finals, no home team managed to score and all four ties were won by the team playing the second leg at home. On the other hand, both semi-finals produced victories for the side playing the first leg at home. Only one knockout tie (Olympique de Marseille v FC Internazionale) was won on away goals.

Something old, something borrowed, something new

One of the many charms of the UEFA Champions League is that it provides enough contrasts and shades of meaning to convert it into something akin to a re-education course for members of the coaching profession. There can be no doubt that Josep "Pep" Guardiola's FC Barcelona has been setting benchmarks. But, interspersed with the blaugrana victories in 2009 and 2011 there have been two title winners of a substantially different footballing complexion. Chelsea FC, just as FC Internazionale Milano had done in 2010, demonstrated that there is a not only a place for non-possession-oriented teams amid the diversities of football, but also that the two opposing schools of thought can be equally valid in terms of obtaining results – and titles. However, the 2011/12 season also provided food for thought in areas such as the role of the striker, the qualities required by goalkeepers, the use of wingers, or the adoption by teams such as Barça and Italian debutants SSC Napoli of the three-man defence, which was commonplace a decade ago but has since become an endangered species.

1/ CHANGING SHAPES

The fact that categorical statements about team shapes are becoming increasingly difficult to make offers a clear indication of greater flexibility from game to game and even within the 90 minutes. FC Barcelona, for instance, experimented with three at the back in some games or in some situations within games. As Howard Wilkinson, one of UEFA's technical observers, commented: "There is no doubt that team shapes have become more flexible over the last decade". Analysis of the entire season therefore focuses on "default settings". Among the top 16, the general trend was towards a 4-3-3 structure, with variations. The default settings of AC Milan, APOEL FC, Barcelona, Inter and FC Zenit St Petersburg were 4-3-3, with six more teams (Arsenal FC, FC Bayern München, Chelsea FC, the two Olympiques (Lyon and Marseille) and Real Madrid CF) usually starting in 4-2-3-1 formation. FC Basel 1893, SL Benfica, PFC CSKA Moskva and Bayer 04 Leverkusen operated an increasingly infrequent 4-4-2 structure though, as discussed later on, attacking partnerships usually featured target and shadow strikers rather than two attackers in tandem. SSC Napoli were alone in using 3-4-3 as their default structure (although it may be significant that Italian champions Juventus operated in a similar formation). However, there are nuances behind the resurgence of "something old". Three-at-the-back systems traditionally relied on three central defenders, with a pair of wing-backs working the flanks. When Pep Guardiola's Barça opted for their Plan B structure, the back three often comprised two full-backs alongside Javier Mascherano, a screening midfielder for much of his professional career. Even with only three defenders, the emphasis was clearly on building from the back.

"The season demonstrated that team shapes matter," commented UEFA's technical director, Andy Roxburgh, "and that the top teams are equipped to adapt during games with a view to maintaining a disciplined defensive order and providing the best framework for attacking freedom."

FC Barcelona's central defender Javier Mascherano plays the ball out from the back, undeterred by the proximity of AC Milan's Zlatan Ibrahimović during the second of four meetings between the clubs.

2/ THE PASSING PARADOX

In the 2008/09 season, Barcelona based their title win on 63% ball possession and something between 600 and 700 passes per game. In 2009/10, Inter won the competition with 45% of the ball (only 32% in the final against Bayern) and marginally over 400 passes per game. In 2010/11, Barça reconquered the summit with 68% possession and 791 passes per game. In the 2011/12 season, Chelsea FC borrowed some of Inter's statistics, taking the title with an average of 47% of the ball and 509 passes per match – an average boosted substantially by their tally of 781 passes when they entertained KRC Genk at Stamford Bridge during the group stage.

The trend towards a passing game was highlighted by the fact that 17 of the 32 starters in the UEFA Champions League averaged in excess of 500 passes per match. Pep Guardiola maintains that this is not unrelated to the general improvements in the quality of playing surfaces. "The pitch is a vital element," he insists. "The better the pitch, the better the passing and the better the game as a spectacle." Barça apart, Arsenal and Real Madrid provided prime examples of teams who excelled at high-tempo short passing combinations. However, the alternating victories over the last four seasons suggest that the top-level game is polarising into a duel between positive possession and contain-and-counter philosophies. The three Italian teams – Inter, AC Milan and Napoli – were not averse to direct back-to-front attacking. It would be wrong to associate the victories for Inter and Chelsea with something borrowed from catenaccio. But Inter were unequivocally identifiable with an Italian philosophy – and was Chelsea's change of style once Italy's Roberto Di Matteo had taken over a matter of pure coincidence?

The trend towards a positive possession philosophy was visible in the playing styles of three of the season's four semi-finalists. But Chelsea's ultimate victory provided a reminder that dominating the ball offers no guarantee of success.

3/ PRESSURE GAUGE

Pep Guardiola ventured the opinion that, like his Barcelona side, a greater number of teams in the 2011/12 UEFA Champions League were prepared to hold a high line and adopt a more adventurous approach. The number of attackers among the list of the competition's most-yellow-carded players certainly confirms that forwards were generally expected to be the first line of defence. Nevertheless, the teams opting for a high-pressure game fell short of the majority. Barça apart, Real Madrid, Arsenal, Benfica and Chelsea (during the first part of the season) were equipped to press hard in advanced areas, along with, occasionally, FC Zenit, CSKA and Leverkusen. As Gérard Houllier commented: "A lot of players and teams have learned how to cope with high pressure and to play out of tight situations. So fewer teams are prepared to expend vast quantities of energy on advanced pressing."

Borussia Dortmund attacker Mario Götze tries to thread the ball past Olympique de Marseille's Souleymane Diawara during the matchday 6 confrontation that produced the elimination of the German champions.

The general tendency was to assemble compact defensive blocks as quickly as possible, to draw the opposition into advanced positions, and then to press aggressively with well-coordinated, collective, vertical and horizontal movements aimed at pressing the ball carrier and his immediate vicinity, with an emphasis on cutting off the short passing options and restricting space. Few of the top teams exerted sustained upfield pressure but many of them had the potential to do so tucked away among their weaponry.

4/ THE WING WONDERS

Ten of the top 16 teams operated with wingers. But it would be misleading to allege that APOEL, Arsenal, Basel, Bayern, Barça, Chelsea, Real Madrid, FC Zenit and the two Olympiques used them in the same fashion – or, indeed, that their wingers had similar personalities. Some coaches opted to deploy one winger rather than two, and the trend towards “wrong-footed” wingers became even more prevalent. Apart from FC Barcelona, who initiated the trend by fielding Lionel Messi on the right wing before moving him into a more central position, Cristiano Ronaldo at Real Madrid, Xherdan Shaqiri at FC Basel, Bruno Cesar at SL Benfica, Daniel Sturridge at Chelsea (and Juan Mata when used in his more advanced role) provided prime examples, along with FC Bayern's pairing of the left-footed Arjen Robben on the right and the right-footed Franck Ribéry on the left.

This policy has marked a trend away from the wingers' traditional modus operandi of running in more or less straight lines with the corner flag or the byline as the objective. The “wrong-footed” winger starts wide and then cuts inside to create havoc in the danger areas. This movement generally takes the ball on to his stronger foot and opens the door for powerful shooting or a deadly, perfectly weighted pass. The wingers' infield runs also open spaces for the overlapping full-backs who, in many cases, have become the main suppliers of crosses. As Arsène Wenger points out: “The demands on the players in the wing positions have become so great that many of them struggle to sustain the pace over the full 90 minutes.” The days of the indolent or under-utilised winger are over.

5/ MOBILITY IN ATTACK

Eleven of the top 16 teams operated with a single striker; the other five fielded two in a 4-4-2 structure – but not with two strikers in parallel. At Basel, Alexander Frei worked in the slipstream of Marco Streller. At Benfica, Pablo Aimar was usually shadow striker behind Óscar Cardozo, as was Alan Dzagoev in relation to Seydou Doumbia at CSKA Moskva. In the Leverkusen attack, André Schürrle alternated the spearhead role with Renato Augusto. However, even though the roles of Didier Drogba and Mario Gomez in the Munich final could inspire debate, the tendency was for teams to veer away from the traditional figure of the target man and to introduce variations and mobility into their front lines.

The trend away from the easily marked target man was highlighted by Sir Alex Ferguson: “The role of the striker these days,” he commented, “is more about movement aimed at creating space for runs from deep positions.” Twelve of the top 16 teams generally operated with three forwards who attempted to create difficulties for defenders with continuous lateral and back-to-front movements. Napoli provided an outstanding example, with Marek Hamšik, Edinson Cavani and Ezequiel Lavezzi exceptionally mobile across the attack – to the extent that heat maps of their spheres of operation often show them overlapping in the centre. Much the same could be said of the AC Milan attack, where the mobility of Zlatan Ibrahimović and Robinho created spaces to be exploited by deep running from, for example, Kevin-Prince Boateng.

Something old, something borrowed, something new

Barcelona took this trend to the extreme by fielding Lionel Messi in the central attacking role. The Argentinian is obviously light years away from traditional definitions of the target man, and his lateral and vertical movements leave opposing defences without a reference point in terms of marking – which paves the way for penetrating runs into the danger zone by Cesc Fàbregas, Andrés Iniesta and co. If this tendency takes root in future Champions Leagues, is the traditional target striker going to become an endangered species?

6/ BEATING THE BLOCK

The challenge facing many of today's coaches – and this applies right through youth development stages in addition to the peak of the professional pyramid – is to help players to unlock defensive blocks. As Fabio Capello remarks: "When we talk about 'defensive blocks' we're basically talking about everybody dropping back at speed to defend in 9-1 formation." This, evidently, doesn't mean a "flat back nine". But it has become commonplace to see teams making rapid transitions into a 4-5-1 defensive structure when the ball is lost. AC Milan's Massimiliano Allegri comments: "The emphasis is on finding ways of breaking through the block before it can be properly assembled."

This implies proficiency in methods of counterattacking. In the 2011/12 season, all of the top 16 teams were capable of executing fast counters, with Bayern, Real,

Napoli, Inter, AC Milan, Benfica, Chelsea (in the latter stages of the competition), CSKA and, among the eliminated teams, AFC Ajax especially impressive in terms of rapid transitions from defence to attack.

Although the classic counter (via a rapid back-to-front pass) is still very much alive, along with the solo counter (as illustrated by the run from his own half by Raul Meireles during the quarter-final against Benfica) the trend is towards collective counters based on a group of players breaking forward at high speed when the ball is won in midfield or can be sensibly played out from the back after a set play against. In the Champions League, the willingness to offer sprint-speed support to this type of counter was impressive. Barcelona, despite preferring a more patient build-up when the ball is won in the defensive third, are highly accomplished in converting the dividends obtained from their high pressure into immediate scoring opportunities, with lightning-fast reactions to regained possession.

7/ THE MIDFIELD SCREEN

FC Porto's head coach, Vítor Pereira, maintains: "The screening midfielder – the one I call our No6 – has become a key performer within the team. He's the one responsible for intercepting opposition moves, breaking from the back, and acting as the team's playmaker." The search for evidence to support his thesis needs to go back no further than the final in Munich, where Chelsea's John Obi Mikel provided a classic example of a player who excelled at breaking up opposition attacks in a central area and initiating his team's response. He and Frank Lampard also performed vital tasks in covering infield runs by the Bayern wingers. The 2012 champions were one of 10 teams among the top 16 to operate with two screening midfielders. Among the six who usually fielded one, the efficiency of the contribution by Sergio Busquets to the FC Barcelona machinery is as valuable as it is unsung by the media. Among the clubs who fielded two, interesting examples of the profiles required by players who occupy the screening positions can be provided by the Real Madrid pair of, usually, Sami Khedira and Xabi Alonso, the latter a major influence not only in breaking up opposition attacks but also in launching counters or sustained attacks, especially via the long diagonal passes he excels at.

8/ TECHNICAL AND EMOTIONAL INTENSITY

Arsène Wenger made the observation: "Running is OK, but understanding of the game is more important". In other words, speed of movement and the tempo of the play are important elements but a high percentage of the speed of the game is in the head. In the Champions League, various types of speed are in the head. Speed of perception needs to be allied with physical speeds and the mental challenges also stretch into the realms of emotional intensity. Big games require big players, and the ability to master emotions becomes a major asset. The 2011/12 season confirmed that one of the basic requirements is above-average mental strength, i.e. the ability to cope with all types of pressure and match situations. The challenge for the coach is to create a never-give-up attitude and to prepare players for all the vicissitudes of top-level competition. Chelsea, the 2012 champions, provided a graphic illustration that resilience and mental toughness can be vital ingredients in recipes for success.

9/ HANDS AND FEET

The final in Munich provided an invitation to reflect on the changing role of the goalkeeper. Post-match statistics revealed that Chelsea's Petr Čech had been required to make six saves during two hours of football and Bayern's Manuel Neuer just two. Neither of them was bombarded with high crosses either. The facts emphasised the need for goalkeepers to be coached in the art of maintaining concentration during periods of inactivity. On the other hand, the minimal need to deal with shots at goal did not signify "inactivity". The modern goalkeeper is expected to be an integral part of attack-building processes and is usually required to take decisions and react quickly in order to fulfil duties as "sweeper" behind the defence. For today's goalkeeper, the traditional virtues of bravery and a safe pair of hands are not enough. There is increasing emphasis on an ability to read the game and to be equipped to make the subtle adjustments, the minute details of movement and awareness which can make the difference when it comes to making the save. Having said that, shot-stopping evidently remains the priority – and this means dealing with matchballs that can swerve and dip when goalbound.

10/ KEEPING THE BALL

It is a blindingly obvious statement that possession play is based on the ability to keep the ball. A former club champion in England, Howard Wilkinson notes the trend towards a ball possession style that is linked to "a significant improvement of technique over the last decade and, especially, the ability to play out of tight situations". UEFA's technical director, Andy Roxburgh, adds: "The standard of combination play, both centrally and on the flanks, has improved beyond recognition."

after season. The passing, shooting and dribbling abilities of Messi, Xavi Hernández and Iniesta are well known, but one of their less acclaimed virtues is their ability to retain possession by turning, screening the ball and making abrupt changes of direction and pace. As the AFC Ajax coach, Frank de Boer, commented: "It takes guts to keep the ball like Barça do and wait for the passing opportunity to come along." It could be argued that the South American influences which have permeated teams such as Milan, Napoli, Inter, Benfica or APOEL have aided developments in technique – which has also contributed to the trend towards defenders who are technically equipped to play from the back through accurate forward passing and switches of play. Chelsea, although not designed as a possession-oriented team, demonstrated this in the final. In the words of Fabio Capello: "[They] always played the ball when under pressure and looked confident and aware of their technical capabilities."

But the bottom line is that, although coaches try to minimise the possibilities of the chance elements working against them, the outcome of a 2011/12 UEFA Champions League which offered some things old, some things borrowed and some things new, underlined the unpredictable nature of football.

TALKING POINTS

THE SPALLETTI MOMENTS

There are some moments in UEFA Champions League football which, although they are seemingly unimportant, offer food for thought. FC Zenit St Petersburg's Italian coach, Luciano Spalletti, supplied a couple of them during the course of the season. When an aggressive supporter, for example, started hammering on the roof of the bench during a game, Luciano's reaction was to come out of the dugout, smile at the fan and shake his hand. The gesture provoked a round of applause in that area of the crowd – and a potentially explosive situation had been very simply defused.

When the Russian club travelled to Lisbon with a 3-2 advantage for the return leg of the round of 16 tie with SL Benfica, Luciano told the English referee, Howard Webb, before that game that he was happy to see top officials appointed for such a game. As it happened, Zenit were defeated 2-0 by goals scored during added time at the end of the first and second halves. Undeterred by the cruel ending and elimination, Luciano shook hands with the English referee and told him that nothing he had seen during the game had changed his mind about the quality of the match officials.

Luciano Spalletti offers guidance during FC Zenit's 2-0 defeat in Lisbon, where English referee Howard Webb was in charge.

Hats off to Luciano Spalletti for keeping his cool at moments which, in the heat of the fray, could easily have been the straws to break the camel's back. He merits applause for reactions based on respect and fair play which, it has to be said, are not the qualities that always come to the fore when stress and pulse rates are high. Within the coaching profession, where a degree of passion for the game is a sine qua non, a question to ask ourselves is whether we have reacted in the same way as Luciano, and whether we think it is feasible to retain a sense of respect and fair play within the high-pressure context of Champions League football.

Further questions emerge from those "Spalletti moments". What is the degree of awareness among top-level coaches of the desirability of adopting role-model behaviour? How many coaches would achieve pass marks if they were examined for the sort of attitudes they try to impart to their players? Footballers are constantly reminded of the need to master the extreme emotions which can be generated during a Champions League season. Should coaches pay the same degree of attention to their mastering of emotions? Who helps them to do so? How many coach education courses prepare students to handle Spalletti moments with the same coolness and class as Luciano?

SHUFFLING THE CARDS

Still on the subject of fair play, the fact that no fewer than seven players missed the UEFA Champions League final through suspensions resuscitates the perennial debate on the current disciplinary system. OK, John Terry's direct red card for an off-the-ball foul during the return leg of the semi-final in Barcelona leaves little room for discussion. But one of the unanswerable questions to arise in Munich was to what extent the absences of Ramires, Branislav Ivanović, Raul Meireles, David Alaba, Luiz Gustavo and Holger Badstuber affected the big game as a spectacle – with the last two having had the misfortune to receive their fateful yellow card during extra time in Bayern's semi-final return leg in Madrid, having completed the 90 minutes without mishap.

English referee Howard Webb signals the offender and shows the yellow card during the first leg of the semi-final between FC Bayern München and Real Madrid CF.

The cases are difficult to judge by the same yardstick. Ramires, for example, received three yellow cards on matchdays 10, 11 and 12 after seven previous appearances without being cautioned. Alaba played eight full matches and received yellow cards on matchdays 9, 10 and 12. The card shown to Meireles in Barcelona was his fifth of the campaign. On the other hand, Luiz Gustavo had been cautioned on matchdays 6, 9 and 12; Ivanović on matchdays 5, 10 and 12. In other words, they missed the final on account of three yellow cards spread over the 12-match campaign leading to Munich. Is this fair?

HOME ADVANTAGE

Ongoing debate about the topic features a basic question about whether fair play should be encouraged, as opposed to focusing on castigating the lack of it. Should players be offered incentives to "keep a clean sheet" when it comes to cards? Among the proposals is the idea that, if a player goes, say, four games without being cautioned, one yellow card could be removed from his record. This would entail a degree of regulation in terms of how many minutes on the field of play constitute an appearance in order to avoid situations where a player could claim his reward after a few token minutes as sub. It also entails an additional administrative burden. But would it be worth the trouble?

How is it possible to have home advantage in a Champions League final? Is it positive in a tactical sense that the finalists are clearly defined as a home team and an away team? Isn't a final meant to be played at a neutral venue? This is a good topic to provoke debate – and the first point to emphasise is that no criticism of Bayern is implied. The Bavarian club engaged in the 2011/12 campaign with legitimate ambitions to play the final in their home city just as, for example, Real Madrid CF had done in the 2009/10 season which culminated in the final at Estadio Santiago Bernabéu. But the venue for the 2011 and 2013 finals offers a stark contrast in that Wembley Stadium in London is not home to a club side and therefore offers guarantees in terms of neutrality. Should this always be the case? Should the clubs who participate in the Champions League season be barred from staging the final?

There are many counter-arguments, starting with the fact that preparing for the biggest event in world club football implies enormous requirements in terms of advance planning. Those responsible for organising the event would argue that waiting till the end of the previous season for a final decision on the venue would present serious problems. Should there be a Plan B? Should there be a shortlist of venues for the final, with the definitive choice made once the participants are known? Would it be fair for regular participants, such as Bayern, to have their magnificent stadium barred from staging a final?

TALKING POINTS

THE FINAL DECISION

Bastian Schweinsteiger's shot cannons off the post; Didier Drogba steps up to convert the winning penalty. Once again, the title was decided by a penalty shoot-out – as have 20% of the finals played since the Champions League was introduced. The shoot-out is undeniably dramatic, but is it football? For many years, alternatives have been sought, notable people within the game have come up with ideas and experiments have been made. But the formula has remained unchanged.

European Championships have been decided via the sudden-death formula of the golden goal – but no goal has ever been scored during extra time in a Champions League final. One school of thought is to adjudicate a winner on the basis of statistics, such as corners or fouls – maybe those committed in the defensive third. Another idea is to raise the bar in terms of difficulty by having an attacker set off from the halfway line with the target of beating one defender and the goalkeeper. The difficulty level would be so high that the winner would be a hero rather than the unsuccessful penalty-taker, who becomes a villain. Another idea is to share responsibility between two players by making one cross the ball and the other volley it goalwards first time. Or should the penalty shoot-out take place after 90 minutes before the 30 minutes of extra time are played?

Game over. FC Bayern had dominated the final but were defeated when Didier Drogba converted the penalty which decided the shoot-out.

TECHNICAL TEAM SELECTION

As has become a tradition at the close of a UEFA Champions League season, UEFA's technical observers selected a squad of players who, in their opinion, had made impressive contributions to the campaign. Ultimate victory, albeit by the narrowest of margins, for Chelsea FC meant that the London club is represented in every department of a squad which highlights the qualities of the four teams which reached the semi-finals, AC Milan's Swedish striker, Zlatan Ibrahimović, the only "intruder". By nationality, Spain is the main provider with six players, while only four play their national team football for non-European countries. Seven of the 2011/12 squad were also selected in the previous season. Continuity at the top of the game is further underlined by the fact that eight of the 2011/12 squad were also named as far back as the 2008/09 season. Special credit is also due to Frank Lampard, who has been a regular in the star squad since the 2005/06 campaign.

Basel v Bayern

- Basically 4-4-2, defending in 4-5-1 structure
- Twin strikers (A. Frei and Streller) – Frei usually deeper
- Left-footed Shaqiri a threat from the right
- Big impact on crosses and cut-backs
- Calmness in possession through midfield (Xhaka)
- Disciplined, resolute and hard-working
- Valuable attacking support from full-backs
- Sometimes long to Streller: good distribution from Sommer
- Attacking mobility and incisive passing
- Good delivery on set plays

Inter v Marseille

- 4-3-3, with Sneijder off the front
- Very experienced group: Zanetti a great leader
- Uncompromising at the back (e.g. Lucio and Samuel)
- Major South American influence
- Long passes from deep-lying Stankovic
- Extremely mobile and hard-working up front
- Aerial threat on well-delivered set plays (e.g. Lúcio, Samuel)
- Sneijder, the creator, with incisive passes
- Excellent setup play (Forlán and Milito)
- Good crosses and cut-backs from full-backs or midfielders

Zenit v Benfica

- 4-3-3 or 4-4-2, usually a lone striker (Kerzhakov)
- Zonal back four, with Denisov the main midfield screen
- Quick transitions – press high when appropriate
- Creative, attacking midfielders (Semak, Shirokov and Zyryanov)
- Accurate long passes, including diagonals
- Dangerous at free-kicks and corners (Lombaerts' aerial power)
- Good setup play and third-man running
- Attacking full-backs – threatening crosses
- Highly competitive, fit and focused team

THE CLUBS

The other 16 qualifiers

The fact that FC Basel 1893 and APOEL FC made history by reaching the knockout stage provided a clear indication that some of the pre-season favourites had failed to make the cut and, arguably suffering a psychological rebound, none of them went on to prosper in the UEFA Europa League, where Valencia CF were the only UEFA Champions League starters who progressed beyond the last 16.

The 2011/12 campaign belied the traditional theory among UEFA Champions League coaches that ten points offer a guarantee of progress beyond the group stage. Manchester City FC achieved this target but found it insufficient to improve on third place in a strong Group A which featured teams from England, Germany, Italy and Spain. On the other hand, three clubs reached the knockout stage despite taking only half of the 18 points available in the group stage, and two teams advanced with eight points (two wins and two draws) from their six matches. Five of the eliminated teams failed to win a match, three of whom (GNK Dinamo Zagreb, FC Oțelul Galați and injury-hit Villarreal CF) lost all six games.

However, the profile of the pre-Christmas fallers differed substantially in comparison with the 2010/11 season, when one of the salient statistics of the teams that failed to make the cut had been, by and large, those who did not focus on a possession-and-passing philosophy. As the statistics on the following pages will reveal, this no longer prevailed as a clear tendency during 2011/12. The 16 fallers did include sides who were not obsessed with possession or elaborate passing combinations (for example, FC Viktoria Plzeň with 39% of the ball and 327 passes per game; KRC Genk with 39% and 396; and FC Oțelul Galați with 40% and 431). On the other hand, seven of the eliminated teams averaged in excess of 500 passes per match (four of them over 600), with Manchester City FC (57% and 697 passes) and Valencia CF (61% and 626) providing the most extreme examples. In other words, domination and possession play were not always readily translated into results. During the 2011/12 group stage, only 3 of the 32 sides (Real Madrid CF, FC Barcelona and FC Bayern München) won more than half of their six group fixtures.

The elimination of the two Manchester clubs (first and second in England's Premier League) along with the champions of Germany, Greece, the Netherlands and Ukraine (FC Shakhtar Donetsk had been quarter-finalists in 2010/11) provides a clear indication of the competitive nature of the UEFA Champions League group stage, in which "taking your eye off the ball" can expose any team to premature elimination.

Wayne Rooney converts the first of the two penalties which earned Manchester United FC a 2-0 away win against Romanian debutants FC Oțelul Galați.

When the goals were scored

The 2011/12 season consolidated some long-standing tendencies. The opening quarter-hour, after a brief upward surge in 2009/10 which alerted teams to the need to be fully mentally and physically tuned in right from kick-off, returned to its familiar status as the least prolific period of the game. However, goalscoring was otherwise fairly evenly distributed over the 90 minutes. Discounting the solitary goal scored during extra time (by champions Chelsea FC), 54.4% of the goals were scored after the interval. As usual, minutes 76-90 proved to be the most fertile – but only marginally so. The difference between the final quarter-hour and the middle period of each half boiled down to something under 0.6%.

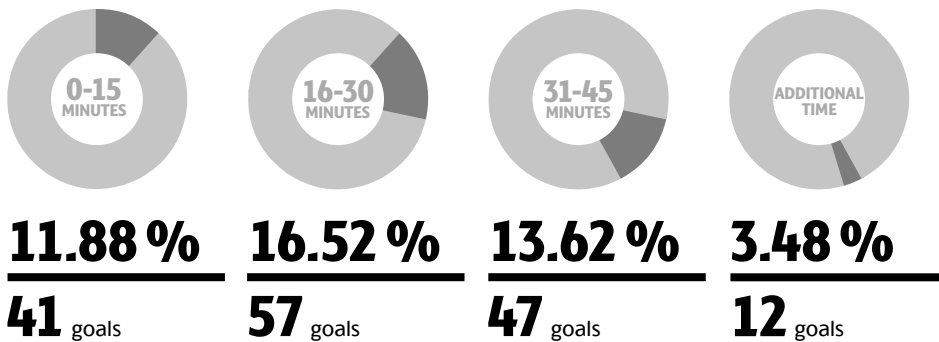

However, one salient feature of the goalscoring patterns which emerged during the season was that almost 10% of the goals were scored during the periods of additional time at the end of each half. It can be argued that goals in this period changed the shape of the competition. Here again, the champions provided an illustration of their relentless pursuit of a result by scoring all three of the goals which eliminated FC Barcelona during a total of 8 minutes and 15 seconds of additional time during the semi-final tie – the winner at Stamford Bridge at the end of the first half; a crucial away goal at Camp Nou in the same period; and the killer blow delivered by Fernando Torres during the 2 minutes 59 seconds of added time at the end of the game.

Individual match situations apart, the statistics demonstrate that any lapses of concentration or physical condition while match officials are consulting their watches are, in the UEFA Champions League, likely to be severely punished by opponents who remained focused from the first whistle to the last.

The 2010/11 season equalled the record set in 2004/05, when 72% of the games played were won by the team scoring first. The 2011/12 campaign registered a noticeable but not spectacular downward trend, even though the graphic clearly illustrates that 63.2% of the 125 games were won by the team scoring first. The seemingly significant decline of almost 9% needs to be qualified by the fact that nine matches failed to produce goals. The adjusted statistic therefore reads that in 68% of the games where goals were scored, the victor was the side which went 1-0 ahead.

Only one of the goalless draws occurred during the knockout rounds – and AC Milan v FC Barcelona could be considered “accidental” bearing in mind the nature of the game at San Siro. FC Zenit St Petersburg and Trabzonspor AŞ registered two 0-0 scorelines in group games, with both matches between AFC Ajax and Olympique Lyonnais also remaining goalless. Of the 15 matches won by the team which went 1-0 down (13% of the games where goals were scored) only two were in the knockout rounds – FC Zenit coming back to beat SL Benfica 3-2 in St Petersburg and SSC Napoli bouncing back to beat Chelsea at home, both in the round of 16. Overall, the number of drawn games rose significantly from 23 to 31 (a 35% increase), which meant that almost a quarter of the games played ended with honours even. Unusually, 5 of the 16 teams who successfully negotiated the group stage did so by winning only two of their six matches.

Shots at goal

There are two main aspects attached to statistics in this chapter: the number of shooting opportunities created, and efficiency in terms of converting them into results. During 2011/12, FC Barcelona were alone in registering over 200 attempts at goal, of which 46% were on target. Pep Guardiola's team averaged around 17 goal attempts per match, whereas APOEL FC reached the quarter-finals despite carving out only 4.6 goalscoring opportunities per match. Lionel Messi averaged six. Barça's Argentinian attacker had 36 shots on target, plus 31 wide of the mark – which means that, although he once again topped the scoring charts, the accuracy of his finishing was not equal to the 67% success rate he had established in 2010/11. In terms of accurate finishing, a number of teams surpassed Barça's average of 46% on-target attempts per game, including Real Madrid (55%), FC Bayern München (54%) and, most strikingly, Arsenal FC at 70% on target. On the other hand, the London club had an uncharacteristically low average of seven goal attempts per match. Only 29% of Trabzonspor's finishing was on target. Individually, Cristiano Ronaldo was Messi's nearest rival in attempts at goal (30 on target/25 wide), while the two opposing strikers in the Munich final ended the season with contrasting records – FC Bayern's Mario Gomez with a tally of 29/15 and Chelsea FC's Didier Drogba with 10/13. Interestingly, six of the top ten teams in terms of on-target attempts per match were eliminated at the group stage.

Corners

The low conversion ratio of corners into goals is mentioned in the goalscoring analysis on pages 10-13 of this report – and this trend was continued and accentuated at UEFA EURO 2012. The UEFA Champions League success rate was 1 in 37 as recently as the 2007/08 season, declining to 1 in 54 in 2009/10 – a figure which was more in line with the 1 in 64 ratio registered at EURO 2008. The chart for the 2011/12 season confirms the peculiar trend in the UEFA Champions League that the teams whose approach play produces the highest number of corners tend to be eliminated in the group stage. The top four were out before Christmas. It is noticeable that quarter-finalists APOEL FC and AC Milan feature in the bottom three, with the latter averaging significantly fewer corners than the other two Italian representatives. Champions Chelsea FC are also positioned among the bottom ten, with an average of only four corners per game. Yet the Londoners' one and only corner in two hours of football in the Munich final was successfully converted and laid the foundations for ultimate victory. The question, bearing in mind the levels of espionage prevalent in the UEFA Champions League, is whether it is worth investing much time on the training ground in rehearsing manoeuvres which may only work once before opponents get wise to the mechanisms involved.

Ball possession

A glance at the rear-view mirror over the last eight seasons confirms that FC Barcelona's position at the top of the ball possession chart has become one of the UEFA Champions League norms, to the extent that, as discussed elsewhere in this report, coaches increasingly search for antidotes and encourage their players to feel comfortable without the ball against possession-oriented opposition. The result was a dichotomy between playing styles, and increased questioning of the value of possession and the need for it to be a positive foundation for attacking play rather than an objective in itself. One statistic to throw onto the debating table is that 7 of the 14 teams which averaged over 50% of ball possession during the 2011/12 season were eliminated at the group stage, including four of the top six. None of Italy's representatives achieved an even share of the ball. Discussion on the relationship between possession and results was carried right the way through to the Munich final, where Chelsea FC (who had had only 28% of the ball during both legs of their semi-final against Barcelona), faced a much more possession-oriented FC Bayern München. The German hosts had 60% of the ball during the first half and the overall percentages at the end of extra time were 56 to 44 in favour of Jupp Heynckes' team. The fact that the 2011/12 final ended with 1-1 on the scoreboard will allow debate on ball possession to continue unabated.

Fouls committed

The introduction of experimentation with two additional pairs of refereeing eyes on the goal lines has coincided with a significant decrease in the number of fouls in UEFA Champions League matches. Are the two factors interrelated? The report on the 2010/11 season remarked that, whereas the 2005/06 campaign had yielded 35 fouls per match, a new benchmark had been set in that, for the first time, none of the 32 participating teams had exceeded 20 fouls per game and the average number of free-kicks per match had fallen below 30, also for the first time. In 2011/12, none of the teams averaged above 18 fouls per fixture and the average number of free-kicks had fallen even further to 28.1 per game. The season's statistics offer food for thought – and discussion – about equations between fair play and results. Six of the nine teams which averaged over 15 fouls per game were eliminated at the group stage. Many of the top teams seem to be aware of the dangers inherent to giving away free-kicks in the defensive third, with FC Barcelona (the stature of their team offering further incentives to minimise set-play opportunities for their opponents) leading the way with an average of only 9.42 fouls per fixture. With regard to the finalists, matches involving

Fouls suffered

FC Bayern München produced, on average, just over 30 fouls; those involving Chelsea FC, just under 26. In the individual charts, the tendency (also linked to the presence of additional assistant referees?) for fouls to be committed by attackers rather than defenders was accentuated during the season, with Zlatan Ibrahimović, Franck Ribéry, Marco Streller, Toni Kroos, Didier Drogba and Mario Gomez featuring among the top ten. Just under one-third of the free-kicks awarded against the silver medallists were for fouls committed in advanced areas by that trio of players. Franck Ribéry was also the season's most-fouled player (he won 45 free-kicks), followed by Lionel Messi with 26.

Yellow cards

The 2011/12 season set a new all-time record in terms of yellow cards. The total of 549 cautions at an average of 4.39 per match represented an increase of 21% on the previous season and reversed a downward trend. The 2009/10 campaign yielded 472 yellow cards and the 2010/11 season 453. The three teams who averaged three or more yellow cards per game were eliminated in the group stage – but so were eight of the nine clubs which recorded fewer than two cautions per fixture, the exception being semi-finalists FC Barcelona. The two finalists were “middle-of-the-table” teams. In individual terms, three players were cautioned five times during the season: Holger Badstuber (FC Bayern München), Raul Meireles (Chelsea FC) and Maxi Pereira (SL Benfica). Dismissals dropped slightly (22 compared with 24 in 2010/11 and 27 in 2009/10) and were significantly lower than the tournament record of 39 set in the 2004/05 season. Only seven were direct red cards – the lowest figure since the 125-game format was adopted. Seventeen clubs had between one and three players red-carded during the campaign. Curiously, seven of the dismissals (almost one-third of the season’s total) occurred on the opening matchday in September, when match officials were fresh from their pre-season briefing. The debating point is, as mentioned in other chapters of this report, whether the sharp increase in the number of yellow cards can be related to the presence of additional assistant referees on the goal line.

Penalties

During the 2010/11 season, the number of penalties rose by 61% compared with the previous year, and the 2011/12 campaign registered a further 24% increase. Once again, this could be related to the presence, during the last two seasons, of the additional assistant referees. Spot kicks proved to be crucial factors in the final outcome of the competition, with Bayern eliminating Real Madrid CF during a shoot-out at the semi-final stage and then losing the title to Chelsea in another shoot-out. Fortune also smiled on the London club during open play, with Lionel Messi striking a penalty against the crossbar during the return leg of the semi-final at Camp Nou and Petr Čech then saving a penalty from Arjen Robben during the first period of extra time in the Munich final.

Offsides

The 125-match campaign registered a slight decrease in the number of offside decisions: the flag was raised 678 times at an average of 5.42 offsides per match, compared with 696 at 5.57 in the previous season. AC Milan, who had headed the chart in 2010/11, were this time surpassed by Turkish debutants Trabzonspor AŞ, whose total of 31 offsides included ten flaggings for Burak Yilmaz in the 270 minutes he played. For the second successive season, Zlatan Ibrahimović topped the individual chart by being flagged 21 times – almost half of AC Milan's total. He was also second in the 2009/10 chart while at FC Barcelona. Gonzalo Higuain (15) and Karim Benzema (12) provided over half of Real Madrid CF's total, while FC Zenit St Petersburg's Aleksandr Kerzhakov strayed offside 11 times during the 360 minutes that he spent on the field of play. PFC CSKA Moskva were the most adept at luring opponents into their offside trap. Villarreal CF were caught offside only eight times but their opponents were flagged on 36 occasions, while, similarly, FC Porto players fell foul of the offside trap only three times in their entire campaign but caught their opponents on 32 occasions. Despite holding a high line and offering space, the effectiveness of FC Barcelona's high pressing can be measured by the fact that their opponents were flagged offside on an average of only 2.92 occasions per game. Unusually, opponents of the two Manchester clubs were caught offside on an average of once per match. However, one UEFA Champions League tradition was extended during the 2011/12 season: the three Italian clubs were among the top ten in terms of straying most frequently into offside positions.
