

team they are supposedly supporting has the mark of true greatness.

I am 16, a fanatical supporter and I never miss a game.

MR. DOCHERTY'S remarks on the crowd's behaviour are extremely true. Perhaps the so called fans have a right to jeer, but they are certainly not true supporters.

If a crowd is behind a team, the team's talents are increased beyond recognition. Surely this was proved against Roma.

As far as I am concerned, Chelsea gave enough entertainment last season to last this season and the next, so why don't we Chelsea supporters repay the club by cheering and not jeering, and let's get out of this rut, so that we can remain a great club.

AS one of Mr. Docherty's selfish supporters, who pays 8/- each match to see his team play and, I hope, win, I wonder what he thinks the supporters are made of—stone?

Surely we cannot all be wrong when we voice our opinions!

I AGREE with Mr. Docherty that a certain section of the Chelsea crowd are useless to the club and I deplored their attitude as the players trooped off the field after the Leicester City match.

Some of the younger Chelsea players knew they had had a bad game without being subjected to such treatment.

I am afraid I am not one of the 200 whom Mr. Docherty refers to as being the best Chelsea fans by reason of the fact that I have to travel at least 70 miles to games at Stamford Bridge, and can never travel away by reason of my occupational shift work, so Tommy, I really do believe your remarks about Chelsea supporters are inaccurate to some degree.

FELLOW Chelsea supporters: As you know, Chelsea have won only one game at home, and for a great team such as the "Blues", it is a bad record. But don't blame the players, blame yourselves for Chelsea would surely win if you give them the support they need.

There are only a few hundred behind the Fulham Road end goal who are willing to shout and sing all through the match.

So why don't you all sing and cheer, and spur the team to victory?
